Characteristic fighting is going on in northern France, where the village of La Bolsselle, 20 miles northeast of Amiens, was taken from the French by the Germans and later recaptured by the French.

At this point there has been much work with the bayonet. A French ammunition depot blew up and part of the willage was destroyed by fire. The Germans, taking advantage of this incident, attacked the French with the steel and drove them to positions beyond. In a fierce counter attack some hours later the French recaptured the position.

A French eyewitness with official authority gives some idea of the nature of fighting that has been going on in the west. He describes the fighting near Soissons 10 days ago as re-with the steel and drove them to positions beyond. In a fierce counter attack some hours later the French recaptured the position.

A French eyewitness with official authority gives some idea of the nature of fighting that has been going on in the west. He describes the fighting near Soissons 10 days ago as resulting favorably for the Allies but later the waters of the Aisne, swollen by the heavy storms, came over the banks, washed bridges away and prevented the Allies from sending reinforcements to points where the French troops were being hard pressed by the Germans. This resulted in a retirement of something like a mile and the establishment of a strong front in a good strategic position on the right bank of the river.
